Last summer, I attended a large family reunion at my uncle's house. The event was filled with laughter, food, and stories from various branches of our family.

During the meal, my younger cousin, who was visiting from another city, decided to play a prank on me. He secretly placed a small toy spider in my glass of water. I was completely unaware and took a sip of water. As I lifted the glass, the spider fell into my mouth. I immediately spat it out, choking (噎住) and coughing. Everyone around me burst into laughter, and I felt my face turning bright red.

I felt like everyone was staring at me, and I wanted to disappear. However, as I looked around, I noticed that my family members were not only laughing but also concerned. My aunt quickly handed me a glass of water, and my uncle patted me on the back, trying to help me recover from the choking.

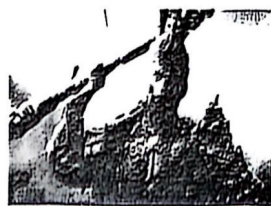

I realized that the situation was not as bad as I thought. My family were simply enjoying the unexpected moment. I took a deep breath and tried to laugh along with them. After a few minutes, I was able to joke about the incident with my cousin. We both laughed about how he had managed to surprise me so effectively. The embarrassment subsided (平息), and I felt relieved that I had been able to handle the situation with humor.

I think good communication is one of the most important skills anyone can have. Whether you're a kid like me or a grown-up, being able to communicate clearly makes everything e 68 and helps avoid lots of frustration and misunderstandings.

Good communication has also helped me make and keep friends. I've found that clearly expressing my t 69 and feelings, and listening when my friends do the same, prevent arguments and hurt feelings. We're able to resolve conflicts (解决冲突) t 70 open and honest discussion. It's easy to misunderstand each other when communicating poorly, which can damage friendships. At school, being able to communicate well with my teachers and classmates helps me learn better. I 71 I don't understand something, I can raise my hand and ask questions until it makes sense. I can also listen carefully to the teacher's instructions, so I know 72 what I'm supposed to do for assignments and project. When we have group activities, good communication between everyone in the group is a 73 for us to work together successfully.

Good communication is very essential in our life.
